

During Interactions with a Zombie Co-Worker

Do:

Don't:

- When showing the new Zombie hire around:

- Point out the break room and common areas

- Ask your new Zombie workmate where he or she wants to keep their supply of brain or chain up a Living captive 'for snacktime'

- If your Zombie coworker asks to borrow a stapler or other office supplies:

- Lend them what they need and help them requisition more supplies if the process is complicated or confusing.

- Ask them how they intend to open your skull with a stapler.

- At the company picnic:

- Offer to share some sunscreen with your Zombie officemate, as the hot sun can be hard on the Differently Animated.

- Confuse them with a Vampire and demand to know how they walk in the daylight without bursting into flames.

- On your Zombie Co-Worker's Birthday:

- Consider a card or a small baked good, while being aware some Zombies celebrate their Reanimation Day instead.

- Wrap a shovel up in a big red bow and offer to drive them back 'home' to the cemetery for the party.

- When Communicating Via Office Email or Other Official Means:

- Show sensitivity by avoiding potentially loaded terms like 'Walking Dead'

- Use terms like 'stench', 'shambler', 'lurker' or other hurtful slang

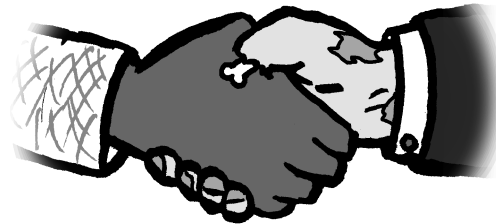

- On 'Bring Your Child to Work Day':

- Greet the Zombie child in a friendly manner and ask them where they attend school

- Respond by screaming 'They're multiplying!' or by barricading yourself in your office/cubicle to wait out the 'Zombie Apocalypse'

Did You Know?

- More Zombies than ever before are participating in the workforce today
- Zombies are also working in a wider variety of fields including traditionally 'white collar' workplaces
- Not all Zombies eat delicious human brain, that is a harmful stereotype
- You will not 'catch' Zombiism from sharing a workspace with a Zombie
- Zombies just want the chance to be hardworking, taxpaying citizens like yourself.

The Living and Differently Animated can, and must, work together in peace.
